Once, when the internet was new and novel, we wondered, why are there so many pictures of cats here? "These days, as the news ages us in dog years, cat memes and videos need no explanation. We just know we need them," notes The New York Times, which features documentary photographer Julius Constantine Motal's series "Cat People." The work has taken him from the Algonquin Hotel's annual cat fashion show to a performance of the Amazing Acro-Cats (a touring troupe of performing cats) to a quiet cat cafe and, most recently, to a cat party without cats. Guests were encouraged to dress up like them instead.

9. Intimate Photos of People and Their Beloved Pet Snakes

Russia-based photographer Jana Romanova's deep-rooted ophidiophobia — fear of snakes — led her to being work on a year-long project documenting people and their pet snakes in her home country, notes National Geographic. Romanova says pet snakes became common after the fall of the Soviet Union. Here images are not simply pictures of snakes—"they are pictures of snakes in common environments," constructed to catch the viewer off-guard, she says. "In the beginning, I couldn't even look at a picture of a snake. Now I wouldn't mind having one as a pet."
